reporters before Friday prayers. "We want peace, we want calm. These people aren't welcome here."

The mosque was closed for security reasons on Tuesday after the association which runs it said that protesters had interrupted services.

As Chalghoumi spoke, a group of around 30 protesters gathered outside the fence of the mosque, facing off with fluorescent-vested security staff preventing them from entering.

The problems at the Drancy mosque have underlined the volatile mix of prejudice, integration problems and fears over radical Islamist extremism that have often plagued France's large Muslim community.

A spokesman for the Grand Mosque of Paris called for a return to calm in Drancy and deplored the manner in which the protesters had "set themselves up as religious police."

Chalghoumi gained widespread prominence in France earlier this year when he backed government calls for a ban on full-face veils called burqas or niqabs, provoking stiff opposition from some local Muslims.

He has also received death threats in the past over his support for dialogue with Jews.

According to some reports, hardline protestors broke into the mosque in January and threatened the imam, although the protestors themselves deny this and accuse Chalghoumi of lying about the incident.

"This is just whingeing," Abdel Hakim Sefrioui, the leader of the protest, told Reuters Television, saying the imam was backed by the CRIF, France's main Jewish association.
